

Person-Centred Counselling

Is a warm, non-judgemental approach that places you at the centre. It's based on the understanding that people grow and heal when they experience three core conditions within a safe therapeutic relationship: empathy, acceptance, and genuine human connection. These qualities help you feel understood, valued, and able to explore your inner world without fear of judgement.

This approach does not direct, diagnose, or tell you what to do. Instead, it offers a steady, supportive space where you can explore your thoughts and feelings at your own pace, trusting your own capacity for insight and change.

Practicalities of a Session

Person-centred counselling sessions last 50 minutes and can take place either in a quiet therapy room or out walking, depending on what feels most comfortable. Some people find the steadiness of a room grounding; others feel more at ease moving through nature, where walking side-by-side can make talking feel gentler and less intense. Both options offer privacy, safety, and a pace that is entirely your own.

How It Works

- You lead the session. You choose what feels important to talk about.
- A safe, accepting space. Your experiences are met with empathy and without judgement.
- A collaborative relationship. Feeling truly heard helps you reconnect with your own strengths and inner resources.

What You Can Expect

- A gentle, grounded approach.
A therapist who walks beside you, not ahead of you
- Space to explore at your own pace
- Support that honours your individuality and lived experiences

What It Can Help With

- Anxiety, stress, and overwhelm
- Low mood or depression
- Trauma and difficult life experiences
- Grief and loss
- Relationship or family challenges
- Self-esteem and identity
- Emotional regulation and resilience

